YOUNG HILDA

AT THE WARS

By ARTHUR GLEASON

The true story of Mr. and Mrs. Oleason's experiences during a year of service on the Belgian battle front with the famous Monro ambulance, which has been under heavier fire than any other.

Unique, absorbing, writ-ten with the quality that distinguishes this writer's earlier work, this volume stands out from the mass of "war books" a vital, living thing.

Indian summer before her as the volume closes. There is a world of modern meaning packed into this Emma McChesney trilogy, Miss Ferber answers, without nsychological or economic hair splitting, many doubting questions. Emma is the economically independent woman of to-day and to-morrow who will never cease to be healthfully, eagerly yet sanely feminine. Therefore our abiding memory is not of the business genius who alone in all the trade was ready with Featherloom bloomers for the sheath skirt when it came in, and with billowy petticoats when it went out and fashion turned back to "fulness around the ankles"—a mere man hopes that he is being correctly technical— but of the woman who awakened to love

Here is Irish humor at its best, a worthy continuation of the tradition of Samuel Lover and Charles Lever, a reveiation of character and mental processes and ingratiating peculiarities of speech—inversions that are more wooing even than the softest of brogues—that flow invariably out of the narrative, never seem forced and have a welcome, sparkling, refreshing effect upon the reader. No better cure for a fit of the blues can be found than in the work of these two shrewd, kindly observers—work that has, moreover, the crowning quality of breeding. Shere is another bundle of their stories to chuckle over and laugh loud and long, and to admire for the unerring definess of their workmanship. And, last but not least, Miss Somerville's ildeftness of their workmanship. And, last but not least, Miss Somerville's illustrations are worth our while. Old Mrs. Knox's picture, for instance, and that unmistakable portrait of "Walkin' Aisy," the stonemason.
